Between the invention of photography in 1839 and the end of the nineteenth century, portraiture became one of the most popular and common art forms in the United States. In The Portrait’s Subject, Sarah Blackwood tells a wide-ranging story about how images of human surfaces came to signify expressions of human depth during this era in paintings, photographs, and illustrations, as well as in literature and cultural representations of portrait making and viewing. Combining visual theory, literary close reading, and in-depth archival research, Blackwood examines portraiture’s changing symbolic and aesthetic practices, from daguerreotype to X-ray. Considering painting, sculpture, photography, and illustration, Blackwood reveals the underappreciated connections between portrait making and our understandings of selfhood and identity. The Portrait’s Subject reveals the underappreciated connections between portrait making and our understandings of selfhood and identity.
