Arms Control Without Negotiation From The Cold War To The New World Order

This book is a major contribution to the study of arms control. Its authors present an agenda for the future in which arms control is no longer seen as a negotiation to be reached after the Cold War but as a continuing process that must be carried forward into the post-Cold War era. The authors argue that arms control is a process of institutionalization that involves the development of norms, rules, and procedures for the management of armaments.

The book is divided into two parts. The first part provides a historical overview of arms control during the Cold War, while the second part discusses the challenges and opportunities for arms control in the post-Cold War era.

In the first part, the authors provide a detailed analysis of the arms control agreements that were signed during the Cold War. They discuss the motivations behind these agreements, the challenges they faced, and the lessons that can be learned from them.

In the second part, the authors focus on the challenges of arms control in the post-Cold War era. They argue that the world is no longer unipolar, and that the United States and Russia are no longer the only nuclear powers. They discuss the need for arms control agreements that are more flexible and adaptable to changing circumstances.

Overall, the book provides a comprehensive and insightful analysis of arms control during the Cold War and the challenges facing arms control in the post-Cold War era. It is a must-read for anyone interested in the history of arms control and the future of international security.
