A Suburb of Europe - Jerry Jerdeki - 1999

In the growing European cultural order, the Poland-based Polish historian Jerry Jerdeki tells the story of a century-long Polish dispute over the merits and demerits of the Western model of liberal progress and industrial civilization. As in several countries of Europe, also in Poland, intellectuals—conservatives, liberals, and (later) socialists—queried whether such a model would suit and benefit their nation, or whether it would spell the ruin of its distinctive cultural features. This heated debate revolved around several pairs of opposing ideas: nation vs. race, the city vs. the countryside, individualism vs. community, national capitalism vs. laissez-faire, traditional customs vs. modernity v. scientism, and so on. It is these various pairs of the main issue which the author analyzes and links together here, describing how difficult and painful the process of modernization was in a nation deprived of its political independence and cultural autonomy.
